

I'm not robot

Hello Getty Images, my name is Jen, and I don't use a cell phone. I also don't have my laptop, desktop, iPad, iPod, or any kind of electronic reader. Don't look for me on Facebook or Inn. And I don't care how a normal insta works, so forget about Finsta. As for Twitter, I had to participate in the write assignment this year, but I tweeted only once and made some errors in the process. LinkedIn has heard that it may help me as a freelancer, and Foursquare will let people know where I'm eating Thai food tonight. But frankly, I would rather chew the sled foil than figure out this app - or any other. I don't like technology. It is an obstacle to my existence. I'm happy to be left behind. Of course, you can access the above devices and social media platforms. My husband Billy passed along his old laptop, so I can use it for work and send an email (I've been told that no one likes email anymore, but it's all about texting, sighing. Does he also have an airy iPad or is it iPad air? I don't know if it's the first version or the second (or what this means), but in the purple case it looks pretty clever. My 16-year-old daughter received Kindle Paperwhite on her birthday last year and she helped me download the novel (I can't read anything up or down or sideways). This seemed like a good idea at the time (the book was all the light we couldn't see, a hefty tome of more than 500 pages). But I had to ask a complete stranger on the subway for help with the bookmark option. There are ways to lighten the screen, increase the font, and look up words I don't know, but if I'm thinking of this, I'll go crazy. Give me a real book on any day of the week (I'm the proud owner of two library cards from a couple of great institutions). Apparently our basement TV has HD features, but had owned for several years before Super Bowl party guests taught me how to turn on this feature (add 7 before the channel - who knew? I've also been told that TVs are smart. I'm dedicated to the card house and would love to see it now, but of course I can't care to get Roku (or learn how to install it). I'd just sit tight and wait for it to come out on the disc of the good old days (a few more months!) but I can record a TV show and I might lead you to believe that it is up to date with Better Colesall and Mad Men. But a sad thing, when I recently clicked to watch the show - the latest in the excellent BBC America crime series Broadchurch - I noticed that it stopped recording after only three episodes. I almost cried. Billy turned his eyes to my stubborn, low-tech life and tried to whippe up his old flipphone to me. I have it in my wallet, but it will never charge. People often call me, so he said, Don't leave voicemail here for Jen --I'll call her home. What is it for landlines? Call me crazy, but I'm happy to live without technology (wait, you can't call - my phone is dead! Or knock on my door. Yes, I don't even have a doorbell.related stories: Why am I not ashamed to have a housekeeper? Detailed information about this content as well as similar content can be found in piano.io skip to the main content if you are tasked with writing essays on class assignments, the project may seem difficult. But your assignment doesn't have to be confused all night, pulling the hair. Think of writing an essay as if you were making a hamburger. Imagine a piece of hamburger: bread on top and bread on the bottom. You can see the meat in the middle. Your introduction is like a top pan announcing a subject,Your supporting paragraph is beef in the middle and your conclusions are bottom bottom to support everything.Seasonings are concrete examples and illustrations that will help clarify important points and keep your writing interesting. (After all, who eats hamburgers made up of bread and beef alone? But if your burger doesn't have beef in the middle, you'll be left with two dry parts of the bread. The introduction paragraph introduces the reader's topic. For example, you can choose to write an essay that says, Technology is changing our lives. Let's start with a hook that attracts the reader's attention: Technology is taking over our lives and changing the world. After introducing the topic and attracting readers, the most important part of the introductory paragraph is your main idea, thesis. Little Seagull Handbook identifies your topic and calls a statement introducing your main points. Your research statement could be read as information technology has revolutionized the way we work. But your topic is more diverse and may cover a somely mundane theme, as in this opening paragraph of Mary Tsaegler's How to Catch River Crabs. Tsaigler grabs the reader's attention from the first sentence: As a lifelong crab (i.e., a person who catches crabs, not chronic complaints), I can tell that anyone who has patience and great love for the river is eligible to join the crabs. The last sentence of your introduction will then be a mini-outline of whatThe essay will be covered. Instead of using outline formats, briefly describe all the important points that need to be explained in a description format. If you extend the theme of the hamburger essay, the supporting paragraph will be beef. This includes well-researched logical points that support your research. The topic sentence in each paragraph may function as a reference point for the mini-outline. Topic sentences are often located at the beginning of a paragraph and describe or suggest the main idea (or topic) of a paragraph. Bellevue College in Washington state shows how to write four different supporting paragraphs on four different topics: a beautiful day's explanation; And cousins who play the writer's joke. Bellevue explains that your support paragraph should provide rich and vivid images, or logical and specific support details, depending on the topic. The perfect support paragraph for a previously discussed technical topic can lying out what's happening today. The Wall Street Journal, a weekend edition of January 20-21, 2018, published an article called The Digital Revolution Overtuns the Advertising Industry: The Divide Between Old Guards and New Technicians. The article explained in detail how one of the world's largest advertising agencies lost McDonald's major advertising accounts to relative start-ups because the fast food chain felt that older distributors were not good enough to use data to quickly create online ads and target slices of customer base minutes. In contrast, young hipers and agencies worked with Facebook Inc. and Alphabet's Google to assemble a team of data experts. You can use this news article to explain that the need for workers who understand and use technology is taking over the world and changing the industry as a whole. Just as a burger needs a durable bottom bun to contain all the ingredients inside, your essay needs a strong conclusion to support and match your points. It can also be thought of as a closed discussion that prosecutors may make in criminal trials. The final discussion section of the trial will take place when the prosecution is trying to strengthen the evidence she presented to the jury. Prosecutors are likely to have provided solid and compelling arguments and evidence during the trial, but it's not until the closing debate that she ties it all up. Similarly, the main points in the conclusion are re-stated in reverse order from the method shown in the introduction. Some sources call this an upside-down triangle: the intro is a triangle on the right, starting with a sharp point of a short razor (your hook), fanning out a bit in the topic statement, and spreading further in the mini-outline. In contrast, the conclusion begins by a broad review of the evidence (the point you made in the paragraph you support) and is an upside-down triangle that narrows down to the correction with the topic sentence.Hook. In this way, you logically explained your points, stated your main ideas, and hopefully left Ginger to convince them of your point of view.
